Wants Time to Develop Planes, He Says—Engagements Ahead.

Charles A. Levine, the first transatlantic airplane passenger, wants to drop out of the limelight so he can develop planes for transatlantic flying, he said yesterday. He had a bad cold, a result of the weather since he returned from Europe.

Levine has accepted an invitation to a dinner to be given by the directors of the Jewish Hospital at Sherry's on next Sunday. He also will be the guest of the Unity Club in Brooklyn on Oct. 26, of the Chamber of Commerce of the Rockaways on Oct. 29; and of the Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce on Nov. 1. He has received offers to go on the stage, but he said yesterday:

"I'm a business man, not a circus performer."
